The way I frame this is that in modern generations, there's a good likelihood that one can and does enjoy many different forms of media: social media, youtube, movies, series, sports, video games, books, music.

They all have their hooks to keep you in as much as possible. You have to draw a personal line for each or even all if you want to make progress in other pursuits (even just other media forms). The time sink should only be done in small amounts unless you truly have nothing else you want to be doing.

Also to note I think is to be mindful of how these things make you feel after consuming/participating - if it just leaves you as tired as you started (or just from being seated for hours on end) or in other ways doesn't make you feel at least the same or better, it's probably not worth continuing.

Of course, tastes change over time as well. I can't game nearly as much as I used to in my childhood because 1)I know I have more fulfilling things to do (work, friends, hobbies) and 2)The sense of achievement finally started feeling fake for me, and I can't justify this "junk food" for my mind.

>For example: You can be a successful professional without spending time on social media.

Then right below it, dude literally has: Facebook, Twitter and LinkedIn buttons.

An older one: Watching tv can become a bad habit. Maybe good bonding time once or twice, but years?

Does one really need to watch the hit show of the season? Talk about with others to be seen as being in the "in crowd"?

Cancel Netflix/Hulu/Disney+/stream subscription and save money & reclaim time to do more meaningful things.
